Wearing White After Labor Day?

Don't wear white after Labor Day! Chirp the ancient etiquette experts at your white mid-September outfit. Are we still adhering to that old fashion rule? We've all heard about the old-school etiquette rule about not wearing white after Labor Day. But where did that come from? The Time magazine says it had to do with the well-heeled wearing white during their summer vacations and then changing back to dark colors for when they returned to their sooty, dusty cities.

For most people in the United States, Labor Day is a day of no work, too much unhealthy food, and possibly a last-minute attempt to get a tan and the day should be met with happiness, but it's tainted by a notorious style rule: don't wear white after Labor Day...largely disseminated by old school fashion advice columnists.

Too many, Labor Day represents the official end of summer, which is already a letdown — does it really need to be made worse by limiting our wardrobe and personal expression because of some outdated statement? And for whatever reason, early September tends to be warmer and warmer and is feeling less and less like fall.

Where did this idea come from that the calendar turns to a different day and suddenly white clothing is a no-go? Chances are it originates from the basic idea that white clothing is typically cooler and therefore is most practical in hotter weather. Most fashion capitals are in the northern United States where the summer and fall seasonal shift represents the start of cooler weather. So the move away from white was encouraged.

Fashion magazines and the media inform trends. So it stands to reason the climate and social aspects of living somewhere like New York City would play into some big fashion trends.

The blustery, muddy fall came, white clothing became not only impractical but a fashion faux-pas waiting to happen. This theory stems from the idea that upper-class ladies in post-Civil War America took great pride in finding new and exciting ways to enforce the exclusivity of their social strata.

More recently, fashion magazines have moved away from the rule and regularly put out suggestions on how to wear fall and winter whites. So of course you can wear white after Labor Day, and it makes perfect sense to do so in climates where September's temperatures are hardly fall-like. It's more about fabric choice today than color. Even in the dead of winter in northern New England the fashionable wear white wools, cashmeres, jeans, and down-filled parkas. The true interpretation is wear what's appropriate -- for the weather, the season, or the occasion...wear what makes you feel good!
